4B Passage

Smile!

Snapping a great picture of someone is pretty easy, right? You could just pull your phone out of your pocket and hold it up. Then, wait for the person to flash a quick smile and press a button. Now you have a portrait, or picture, of that person. It was not always that easy to make a picture of a person. Before cameras could take photographs, portraits were created by painters.

Painted Portraits:

In the early years, if you were going to have your portrait painted, it was most likely because you were an important person. The portraits of powerful kings and queens were painted along with wealthy people and those who were in powerful positions. Painters also made portraits of important people from history or religion.

Painting at this time was only done by trained and skilled artists. It took a lot of skill to make all of the materials needed. Brushes, canvases, and paints were made by hand. A person sitting for a portrait would have to sit for long periods of time while the artist worked. Paintings were often very large, and it could take years before a portrait was finished.

In the mid-1800s, portraits began changing. Factories began producing materials needed for painting. Anyone could buy supplies at a store without having to make them. People also began painting scenes of everyday life. Portraits were no longer just for royalty.
